PARASCHIS HOUSE

KOILADA . GREECE

Due to the topography, and in order to maximize the views and the best orientation, this family house located two hours from Athens was distributed to provide proper sunlight through the use of courtyards and roof lighting. The site can be accessed by two streets, one on the top level and another on the lower level. The project fully unfolds on the first floor. Before the entrance, located in the center of the floor plan, there is a large courtyard with a parking lot as a pergola and access to the services area. After crossing the threshold the different rooms are laid out: in the center and to the left are the common areas and to the right, the bedrooms. The corridor to these bedrooms is designed so that one wall opens onto the main entrance, with woodwork and wooden walls. The stone walls, alternating straight and curved lines, are features both on the interior and exterior of the home. Water is once again an axis running through the house in different ways. It is featured as a pond at the entrance and continues through the exterior as a canal that runs between the stone walls of the main suite and living room. Eventually, it flows into a small pool that is an extension of the bathroom suite, ending in the large infinity pool. Outside lounge areas with pergolas and a solarium were designed. On level -1 and at the other end of the site there is an apartment designed for guests.
